The story of the Missouri Association of Councils of Governments (MACOG) is, in reality, the story of the Regional Planning Commissions (RPCs) in the state. It is a story of how diverse interests can coalesce to provide mutual support and achieve common objectives. It also a story of how the process of governance has evolved over the last thirty years, giving rise to a strong system of regional councils that provide state government and local communities with an effective means to delivery services and solve pressing public problems.
